

Michael R. Curry is a Professor Emeritus in the Department of Geography at the University of California, Los Angeles. He works at the intersection of cultural geography and the history and philosophy of the geographical ideas of space and place. His research concerns the connection between changes in information technologies, and especially locational technologies, and the conceptualization of place and identity.

He is the author of two books and over fifty articles and book chapters, including Digital places: Living with geographic information technologies. London: Routledge (1998); "The power to be silent: Testimony, identity, and the place of place," Historical Geography 28 (2000): 5-16; and "Toward a geography of a world without maps: Lessons from Ptolemy and postal codes." Annals, Association of American Geographers 95, no. 3 (2005): 680-91.
